TUESDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 2, 1858.

"THE SUMMER IS ENDED." No thoughtful mind can contemplate or reflect on these words of truth and soberness, "The summer is ended," without feelings of sadness. Meditations upon words of such deep import will stir the deep springs of emotion which lie far beneath the surface of the mind's ordinary themes of thought. It is no matter how cheerful and gay one may really be by nature and education, yet even such will now betray feelings of sorrow. The beautiful flowers that blossomed every where, over hill and dale, upon the mountain side and in the deep vale, have faded and perished, leaving behind, however, the germs of a tuture life. The summer birds that made every hedge, orchard, grove, and woodland, not excepting the deep and almost impenetrable forests, vocal with their varied and tuneful sounds, have flown to their Southera homes to gladden other pilgrims and eojourners of their fleeting changeful life; as they have the inhabitants of more Northern climate during their stay. The days whose twilight lingered long, leaving but a short space between them and the early dawn of a new day, have greatly shortened. All these, and many more pleasing things that will suggest themselves to thoughtful and meditative minds, have passed away never more to return. Themes such as these might well serve to fill our minds with sadness were it not for the delights of the present. Happy it is for man that he is so constituted that his highest and purest feelings of joy are those that are tinged with the melancholic element. Hence the love for music that is set to the minor key. So there is truth, not less than sentiment, in the words of one of nature's poets who has sung of autumn days as the sweetest and saddest of the year. Though summer days and birds and flowers have gone, we are entering upon what is to some the most joyous period of the year; for it is said better is he who putteth off his armor than he who putteth it on. Autumn comes richly laden with luscious and golden harvests, the products of human labor, skill, forethought, and sagacity. Not only is the appetite appeased by being amply supplied, but the taste for the beautiful is also abundantly furnished.

The summer green of the lawn and the forest have as yet scarcely changed, though here and there may be seen the tinged leaf, the indication of premature decay. Walk into the fields and listen to the mournful shrillings of the insect world, whose plaintive sounds tell us of departed days.

As autumn advances the scene changes .--Soon the most gorgoous hues will every where meet the eye of the pilgrim as be views the landscape; and very soon it will be said, "October's brush the scene hath closed."

Though the "summer is ended," the thoughtful observer of nature's changes in her onward course wants not subjects for contemplation. They abound all about him or rather about those who dwell beyond the brick walls and pavements of the densely througed city. It is the animate kingdoms that most delight and charm. Even--

"The grass, with its low insect tones, appears As murmuring in its sleep. This butterfly Seems as if loth to stir, so lazily It flutters by. In fitful starts and stops

The locust sings. The grasshopper breaks out In brief, harsh strains, amid its passing chirps. The beetle, glistening in its sable mail, Slow climbs the clover-tops; and e'en the ant Darts round less eagerly.'

This is a beautiful world whose denizens we are, potwithstanding sin and sorrow and much more abound. There is so much more occasion for joy than sadness, that the minthe former. It is said, bad it not been for the introduction of sin into the world the minor key of music would not have been heard. So of the revolving seasons: were it not for autumn and winter, spring and summer would lose half their charms. So let each successive season be improved that we may ever be able to say it has been the pleasantest and happiest ever enjoyed. Then will life be crowned with joy and rejoicing .- "Cross City,"

A pretty woman is like a great truth or a great happiness, and bas no more right to bundle herself under a green veil, or any other similar abomination, than the sun has to put on green spectacles.

It is an old saying that Time waits for no man-but the fair sex would have us believe that he is gallant enough to wait for the
